Bruce Ragsdale oversaw this project from start to finish and worked closely with me to determine the scope and presentation of this wealth of data. Matthew Axtell conducted a substantial amount of the preliminary research for this volume, including collecting the relevant congressional statutes up to 1921 and surveying the archival materials related to the appropriations process in the nineteenth century. Jake Kobrick assisted with proofing the data. Thanks to Geoff Erwin for formatting the tables and closely editing them for greater consistency and clarity of presentation.

Appropriations and Financial Administration in the Courts: An Historical Overview

Throughout its history, the chief source of funding for the federal judiciary of the United States has been money authorized by Congress to be expended out of the general funds of the federal treasury. The federal judiciary has also received support from other sources, such as litigant fees and the fines, forfeitures, and penalties collected by the courts in the course of government litigation. This brief introductory essay surveys the changing procedures for determining the level of congressional appropriations and for disbursing appropriated funds throughout the federal judicial system. The essay also examines the historical relationship between the federal courts, Congress, and the executive agencies charged with supervising judicial expenditures and budgeting.

In each annual appropriations statute, Congress appropriated funds to pay the salaries of federal judges, the Attorney General of the United States, and district attorneys and district marshals. Congress also appropriated money—referred to by lawmakers and Treasury Department officials as the “Judiciary Fund”—to pay for the operating expenses of courts.

The expenses paid for out of the Judiciary Fund included per diem and travel expenses of jurors, witnesses, clerks, district attorneys, commissioners, and district marshals. The Judiciary Fund also covered the expenses and fees charged by the district attorneys and marshals in the prosecution of crimes against the United States and the detention and maintenance of prisoners. In 1830, the statutory language for court expenses was expanded to include those related to “suits in which the United States are concerned.” In 1867, the Judiciary Fund was designated also for “legal assistance to the Attorney-General, and other special and extraordinary expenditures, in cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which the United States are concerned.” The cost of operating the courts, then, also included the expenses of the United States government as a litigant in the courts.

The funds specified in the annual appropriations statutes were only a portion of the total amount of money available to the judiciary at the start of each fiscal year. Congress also appropriated for court expenses the “funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures” that were collected by the courts and turned over to the Treasury, the amount of which varied from year to year. The courts also began each year with unexpended balances of appropriations carried over from previous years. Under an act passed in 1795, unexpended balances could be carried over for two years after the expiration of the fiscal year for which the funds were appropriated, at which point the Treasury was required to transfer the balances to the so-called “surplus fund.” Money in the surplus fund was unavailable to the Treasury and had to be reappropriated by Congress.<sup>1</sup>

The district marshals and the Department of the Treasury worked together to estimate the upcoming financial needs of the courts and to disburse appropriated funds. Marshals were the disbursing agents for the district and circuit courts and were thus responsible for distributing from the Treasury the fees, per diem, and travel allowances of jurors, witnesses, clerks, and attorneys. Marshals paid for all contingent expenses of the courts as well, such as rental of courtrooms, furnishings, and the transport, housing, and subsistence of prisoners.

Marshals were responsible for communicating to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates of expenses for the coming fiscal year. The Treasury Department—after 1818, specifically, the Register’s Office—reviewed the estimates submitted by marshals as well as the accounts maintained on each district court by Treasury accounting officers to estimate the needs of the entire judiciary for each coming fiscal year. The Register presented the estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, who submitted them along with those for the other government agencies to the appropriate committee in Congress: between 1794 and 1865, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives; after 1865, the House Committee on Appropriations.

Once funds were appropriated, district marshals submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates of upcoming expenses prior to each term of court and requested advances of funds. Each marshal posted a bond and could receive advances only up to that amount. The First Auditor of the Treasury and the Comptroller reviewed the estimates and the Secretary of the Treasury would sign a warrant for a specific amount of money to be remitted to the marshal; that amount was then deposited by the marshal in a national bank or other approved depository. Upon disbursing the funds, the marshal submitted returns to the Treasury, certified by the district judge, accounting for court expenses and the marshal’s expenditures. The First Auditor, who maintained accounts for each judicial district, made a preliminary review of the returns to ensure that the funds were properly accounted for. The Comptroller of the Treasury then reviewed and “adjusted” the accounts if he found any expenditures to be inconsistent with the appropriation statutes. If the auditor or the Comptroller found that the fees or expenses claimed by the marshal were not provided for by statute or were charged at a higher rate than that fixed by Congress, he could disapprove the account and not credit the marshal with the money spent. In those cases, the Treasury would inform the marshal that a portion of the funds advanced was owed to the government. The amount would usually be deducted from the advances for the next term of court. In cases where marshals had exhausted their advances, they submitted requisitions to the Treasury to be able to meet outstanding expenses or to be reimbursed for expenses paid for out of pocket. In 1849, Congress created the Department of the Interior, which began supervising judicial accounts. The Comptroller of the Treasury continued to review and “adjust” accounts prior to final settlement.

In the 1840s, Congress placed caps on the amount of fees that court officers could retain as compensation and, in so doing, brought key changes to the supervision of accounts. Prior to 1841, clerks, commissioners, district attorneys, and marshals kept as their compensation the fees collected from private litigants. In the 1841 appropriation statute, Congress set a maximum compensation for marshals, district attorneys, and clerks, and it required court officers to return all fees to the Treasury above that amount, less the expenses of their offices and pay to deputies. A section in the 1842 appropriation act required all court officers to submit accounts twice a year at fixed times and to disclose all fees and emoluments received by themselves, as well as by their deputies. The new limits on compensation meant that the fees collected above the set maximum were considered revenue of the United States government. The Comptroller of the Treasury ruled as well that court officers owed the government not just the actual cash collected above the statutory compensation limit, but all recorded fees above that limit whether they were able to collect them or not.<sup>2</sup>

The changes in compensation and accounting arose from congressional concern, dating back to 1830, that the expenses of the federal courts were growing too quickly and that court officers were earning exorbitant fees. A congressional committee investigated court expenditures and concluded that courts were instituting unnecessary proceedings and requiring excessive forms and procedures as a way to generate more fees. For example, the investigators charged that attorneys prosecuted several suits or indictments where a consolidation into a single case would have been more appropriate, or clerks issued multiple writs where a single one would have been sufficient. The committee recommended a bill that would increase compensation for basic duties and equalize them among the courts so that officers would be paid more for their work and end the temptation to abuse the system with extra forms and proceedings.<sup>3</sup> Congress responded with an 1853 statute that set out a uniform fee schedule for all court officers and placed specific limits on the amount of money that marshals could spend on certain contingent expenses without the prior approval of the Secretary of the Interior.<sup>4</sup>

1871–1939

In 1870, Congress established the Department of Justice and assigned to it the administrative responsibility over the courts previously exercised by the Department of the Interior. The Justice Department was created to consolidate the various law officers throughout the Executive Branch departments and bring more supervision over all of the attorneys in government, including the district attorneys, under the Office of the Attorney General. The office of the Solicitor of the Treasury was transferred to the Department of Justice and took the lead in supervising the accounts of clerks, district attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and oversaw procurement services and the preparation of budget estimates for the courts. The Justice Department also employed a small number of examiners tasked with auditing the accounts of court officers for the purpose of detecting fraud.

Beginning in 1870, Congress passed a series of laws designed to give itself greater control over the finances of the courts and executive agencies. The appropriations statute for FY 1871 included two key provisions. First, the statute included what came to be known as the Anti-Deficiency Law, which stated that no government department could spend, or contract to be spent, any more in a fiscal year than was appropriated by Congress. Second, the statute provided that all balances of annual appropriations remaining unexpended at the end of a fiscal year would remain available only to pay expenses incurred during the year for which they were appropriated.<sup>5</sup> Any reimbursement claims for expenses incurred in fiscal years for which the funds had been transferred to the surplus fund had to be reviewed by auditors in the Department of the Treasury and reappropriated by Congress.

The new controls over judicial finances led to the proliferation of appropriation statutes to provide for deficiencies in the funds available for current and previous fiscal years. Each year, when the Attorney General submitted estimates for the annual appropriations of the judiciary, he would also report to Congress how much had been expended from the current year's appropriations and request additional funds for accounts that would likely be, or were already, exhausted. During FY 1873, Attorney General George H. Williams urged Congress to exempt previous years' balances of over $600,000 from the provisions of the 1870 statute limiting the use of funds and asked that all subsequent appropriations from the judiciary be exempted.<sup>6</sup> Congress did not grant the courts an exception.

Throughout the late nineteenth century, the Department of Justice struggled to keep the costs of the courts down. Congressional concern with rising court costs led to the creation in 1874 of a House Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to review the accounts of the Department and the courts, especially the accounts of the district marshals. The Committee on Expenditures investigated the expenses of a number of judicial districts and concluded that "gross frauds" were evident. The committee offered suggestions for decreasing judicial expenditures, including reducing the number of commissioners and assistant district attorneys and a consolidation of recently created judicial districts.<sup>7</sup> In 1875, Congress passed a statute requiring that clerks, marshals, district attorneys, and commissioners prove in open court, under oath and supported by documentation, their claims for reimbursement from the Treasury.<sup>8</sup>

The most important recommendation to emerge out of the work of the committee, which continued its work and held in-depth hearings in 1884, was to convert marshals and district attorneys from fee-based compensation to annual salaries. The committee contended that attorneys and marshals instituted legal proceedings for the "mere sake of personal gain," especially in criminal cases. Examiners in the Department of Justice and investigators for the Committee on Expenditures reported that marshals (or most often, their deputies) collected unwarranted fees and expenses, such as mileage when they had not traveled and per diems when they had not actually attended court. Examinations found that some marshals underreported the extent of the emoluments collected by them that were due the Treasury. Similar complaints were levied against district attorneys and U.S. commissioners. Congress finally passed a law converting marshals and attorneys to the salary system in 1896 and required all fees collected by marshals to be deposited with the district clerks and by them forwarded to the Treasury.<sup>9</sup> The statute also required that marshals and district attorneys obtain prior authorization before incurring certain office expenses, purchasing supplies, or employing deputies and clerical assistants. Clerks of court were converted from fees to salary in 1919 and also required authorization for office expenses and supplies.

Other regulations were put in place to try to limit reliance on deficiency appropriations. The Department of Justice required more frequent, detailed, and uniform estimates and returns from district marshals. Marshals submitted quarterly estimates and requisitions on several forms issued by the Department and dedicated to specific appropriation accounts. In years where the Department of Justice recognized that funds would be exhausted, the Attorney General instructed district marshals to return any funds advanced to them that would not be needed so that they could be redistributed to other districts. In 1906, Congress passed a statute requiring executive agencies to apportion annual appropriations by monthly and other allotments, so as to prevent agencies from requiring deficiency appropriations during the year.<sup>10</sup> Each year, the Department of Justice created a spending plan to allot funds between various categories within the primary appropriation accounts; the spending plans contained instructions to limit expenditures to prescribed amounts each quarter of the year.

1940 to Present

With the creation in 1939 of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts (AO), the judiciary took control of formulating its own budget requests. The Director of the Administrative Office compiled expense information from the courts and prepared the budget estimate for the entire judiciary, which was transmitted to Congress through the Bureau of the Budget without any alterations. The AO prepared the budget for the courts of general jurisdiction, while the Supreme Court and other courts of special jurisdiction handled their own budgets separately. After 1958, the Judicial Conference established a standing Budget Committee, which reviewed budget estimates submitted by the AO, as well as estimates from other committees of the Judicial Conference, related to judiciary-wide initiatives and programs.

After 1939, the relationship between judicial expenses and Executive Branch expenses changed in annual appropriations statutes. The salaries of U.S. attorneys and U.S. marshals were incorporated in appropriations for the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice continued to play an important role in the administration of judicial finances, however. United States marshals continued to act as disbursing agents for the individual courts, and officials at the Justice Department retained responsibility for auditing and investigating court accounts. In 1975, the last administrative tasks fulfilled by the Department of Justice were transferred to the AO. The AO took over the role of auditing judicial accounts and established a new Office of the Audit. Also that year, the clerks of court took over the disbursement functions at the court level and exercised greater management responsibility over finances.

Beginning in 1987, the AO and the Judicial Conference began a movement to decentralize the budgeting and spending processes of the judiciary. Up to that time, the AO handled the administration of payroll, procurement, accounting, and contracting for the courts. The AO staff, following the trend begun by the Department of Justice early in the twentieth century, purchased all equipment and supplies based on requisitions from the individual courts. Under budget decentralization, after funds have been appropriated by Congress, the Executive Committee of the Judicial Conference adopts a National Financial Plan that sets spending priorities for the entire judiciary. The AO is responsible for allotting the funds to the individual courts, which it does according to formulas that consider projections about future caseloads and the staffing needs of the courts. Beginning with fiscal year 1993, Congress has included a provision in the appropriation acts that grants the AO greater authority to transfer funds between appropriation accounts.

Beginning in 1998, the allotments were simplified from 64 separate expense categories to 3 broad classes: salaries, operating expenses, and automation. The individual courts were then responsible for allocating these funds into more specific categories, or “budget object classifications.” Courts are required to submit to the AO an organization plan describing the administrative process for budgeting, spending, and accounting as well as detailed spending plans. The courts have the ability to transfer funds among different classifications with the approval of the AO. All transfer of funds must be reported to the AO in quarterly Status of Funds reports; these reports allow the agency to monitor which object classifications have surpluses or deficits and then to adjust the National Financial Plan and budget estimates accordingly. A number of key allotments remained under the central control of the AO, including salaries, travel expenses, training of judges and chamber staff, benefits for judges and court employees, jury fees and expenses, and rent paid to the General Services Administration for courtroom space.

Since 1939, special funds—that is, money received by the government under special authorization of law and which may be expended only for the particular purpose specified—have become more important to the judiciary. In 1946, Congress passed a statute directing that bankruptcy fees be paid into two funds, from which the salaries and expenses of referees in bankruptcy would be appropriated. (The salaries and expenses of bankruptcy courts became a regular appropriation after the reorganization of those courts in 1978.) Beginning in 1986, the federal courts collected into a special fund the fees paid by litigants for filing civil cases. In each annual appropriation statute, Congress authorized monies in the special fund to be used toward the expenses of the operations and maintenance of the courts. In 1990, Congress converted the appropriations from the fund to a permanent, indefinite appropriation that did not need to be renewed each year. The funds were available for expense accounts, as the courts needed, until expended.

In 1990, Congress established another special fund, the Judicial Automation Fund (later renamed the Judicial Information Technology Fund).<sup>11</sup> The fund was designated for expenses related to automation in the collection, management, dissemination, and protection of judicial information. The monies in the Judicial Information Technology Fund carry over automatically from year to year, giving the judiciary the flexibility to plan and budget for multiyear technology projects and investment. Money for the fund is not specified in the appropriations statute but is deposited into the fund based on spending priorities set by the Judicial Conference. Money in the Judicial Information Technology Fund cannot be transferred to other purposes without approval from the AO.

Introduction to Appropriations Tables

These tables present the detailed history of congressional appropriations for the federal judiciary from 1792 to 2010. Each table reports the funds appropriated by Congress through statute for each fiscal year and the citation information for the relevant statutes.

For each fiscal year, the table reports the line-items for judicial funding included in the annual appropriations statute. Each fiscal year also includes any funds appropriated during that fiscal year through so-called deficiency or supplemental appropriation statutes. When Congress passed a deficiency appropriation, it authorized funds to be applied to both the current fiscal year and expenses incurred and outstanding from previous fiscal years. These tables report all deficiency appropriations as part of the fiscal year during which the statute was passed. In some years, Congress passed legislation requiring across-the-board funding rescissions—usually a percentage of all discretionary government spending. These rescissions have not been calculated but are noted when they occurred. At other times, Congress authorized that specific amounts be transferred from one appropriation account to another. These transfers are reported as negative appropriations for the account from which funds were transferred. The table does not include reappropriations of unexpended balances unless those balances were transferred between accounts.

The amounts presented in the table are taken from the portions of annual appropriations statutes that were labeled as “Judicial,” “Judiciary,” or “United States Courts.” What specific objects of funding were considered to be “judicial” or court-related has changed considerably over time. For example, expenses that would today be considered part of the Executive Branch—such as salaries and expenses of the Attorney General’s Office and activities of the Department of Justice—were categorized as “judicial” for much of the nation’s history. In a few cases, appropriations listed under the executive department charged with supervision of court finances (Department of Interior or Department of Justice) were included in the table if the items were clearly related to the operation of the federal courts.

Whenever possible, the headings, labels, and line-items are organized and presented as they appeared in the statutes. Prior to 1842, however, the statutes included no headings either identifying the judiciary as a distinct entity or for organizing the various line-items that constituted the judiciary’s appropriations. In those cases, for organizational clarity, headings—such as “Salaries” and “Court Expenses”—have been added and are set off with brackets. The descriptions of the line-items are summaries and not reproductions of the full details included in the statutes. For clarity, modern language usage has been used. If a category or line-item included detailed appropriations that concluded with a total “in all,” the table reports the “in all” figure only. In some cases, Congress appropriated funds without specifying an amount; these are included with the word “indefinite” in place of a dollar amount. The “Total Appropriation” included at the end of each fiscal year is not a total reported in any statute or report, but has been calculated based on the line-items in the statutes listed. Note that the “Total Appropriation” is not the total amount of funds authorized to the judiciary in a given year, since it does not include indefinite appropri-tions, unexpended balances carried over from previous years, funds that Congress made available for multiple years, or permanent appropriations not reauthorized in each year's statute, such as judiciary filing fees and other special funds.

Between 1791 and 1879, expenses for the operations of the courts were appropriated in a single line-item, which members of Congress and Treasury officials often referred to as "the Judiciary Fund." The line-item for "defraying the expenses of the Supreme, circuit, and district courts" included the fees and expenses of jurors and witnesses, the costs of prosecution of crimes against the United States, and the keeping of prisoners. In 1830, the language for court expenses was expanded to include expenses related to "suits in which the United States are concerned." In 1867, the court expenses were designated also for "defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, including legal assistance to the Attorney-General, and other special and extraordinary expenditures, in cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which the United States are concerned." The line-item for court expenses specified that these funds were appropriated "in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures," which were received by the Treasury and earmarked for court expenses. After 1872, the statutes no longer specified that appropriations for court expenses were "in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures." Beginning in 1880, Congress itemized in more detail the various components of the Judiciary Fund, with individual line-items for fees of marshals, clerks, district attorneys, jurors, and witnesses, as well as funds for courtroom rent, support of prisoners, and the cost of transferring prisoners from the District of Columbia to local prisons. A paragraph describing which courts and purposes were designated for "defraying the expenses" preceded the line items. The language of this paragraph changed over the years. For example, from 1872 to 1893, Congress included the costs associated with the enforcement of the voting provisions of the 1871 Force Act, which provided for the appointment of supervisors of congressional elections and gave new responsibilities to district marshals in monitoring elections. After 1913, the statutes no longer included the paragraph describing "the defraying of expenses."

Note for Further Research

The appropriations statutes passed by Congress are just one source for analyzing appropriations throughout the judiciary's history. Since 1826, Congress has after each session published a summary of all the appropriations made during that session, including those for the judiciary. The exact contents and title of this report has changed over the years: "Statement of Appropriations Made" (1826–1840), "Appropriations, New Offices, etc." (1841–1923), and "Appropriations, Budget Estimates, etc." (1924–present). Since 1924, this report has included a comparison between the original estimates submitted to Congress, the amount appropriated during the previous year, and the amount appropriated during that session. Researchers interested in further exploring the legislative history of judicial appropriations can also consult committee hearings on appropriations bills, where representatives of the judiciary explained appropriation requests and discussed changes in statutory language and organization of accounts.

Reports prepared by executive agencies and submitted to congressional committees responsible for appropriations are also an important source. Between 1789 and 1922, the Treasury Department began the appropriations process each year by submitting to Congress estimates of expenditures for the coming fiscal year, which was published as a House Document each year. Beginning with fiscal year 1818, these estimates included a detailed list of all appropriated items, including those for the judiciary. The Treasury estimates at times differed from congressional statutes in terms of organization and categorization of expenses as “judicial.” Starting with fiscal year 1836, the Treasury estimates also included a comparison of each estimate with the amount appropriated the previous year. After 1923, the estimates were prepared and submitted to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget (renamed the Office of Management and Budget in 1970) and titled “Budget of the United States Government.” Between 1871 and 1939, the Department of Justice also periodically submitted estimates specifically related to court expenses, including estimates of deficiencies expected during the fiscal year.

The Treasury Department has issued reports with information on the expenditures of the Judicial Branch. The Treasury reported to Congress the actual expenditures of the government in its annual report on the “State of the Finances,” which included a total expenditure of the judiciary starting with fiscal year 1821. The Treasury reported a more detailed summary of judicial expenditures beginning in 1845 in another annual report titled variously “Receipts and Expenditures,” “An Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of the United States,” “Receipts and Disbursements,” and “Combined Statement of Receipts, Disbursements and Balances of the United States Government.” From 1845 to 1890, these reports detailed each disbursement of salaries and reimbursement for fees and expenses to court officers.

The agencies charged with oversight of judicial finances also produced important sources of information. From 1871 to 1939, the Annual Report of the Attorney General of the United States included information on appropriations, expenditures, and balances of the various court expense accounts under the control of the Department of Justice. The Attorney General report also included a district-by-district breakdown of expenditures out of the Judiciary Fund. From 1940 to 2001, the Annual Report of the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts included a summary of appropriations, a breakdown of the allotment of spending within the judiciary, and discussion of the difference between judicial funding requests and final appropriations granted. Since 2002, the director’s report has included only a brief overview of the judiciary’s appropriations. The reports of the Budget Committee of the Judicial Conference, beginning in 1958, include detailed budget requests and justifications submitted to Congress.

The Government Printing Office (GPO) has published online the complete budget proposals of the federal government since 1996, available at <http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/>. The materials include budget appendices that present detailed explanation of objects covered by each appropriation account as well as information on obligations, outlays, and permanent appropriations (such as collected filing fees) not specified in annual appropriation statutes. The GPO also provides access to the Public Budget Database, historical tables presenting budget authority since 1976 and outlays since 1962.
